
CJO joins the ranks of Manuscript Central™ clients!

Advantages for authors include clearer guidelines for manuscript preparation, better templates, and an improved ability to interact with the Journal through the editorial process.

Manuscript Central, a product of ScholarOne™ (Thomson Reuters), is an innovative, peer review and online submission application for scholarly publishers, societies, and associations.

Manuscript Central serves over 280 societies and publishers, 2800 books and journals, and has 12 million registered users. It is used by researchers and journals in the fields of humanities, science and medicine, such as the BMJGroup and the Canadian Medical Association Journal. It enhances the review process and streamlines the procedures, from submission to decision. Many of the processes that were done manually will be automated in the new system.

Advantages for authors include clearer guidelines for manuscript preparation, better templates, and an improved ability to interact with the Journal through the editorial process. Reviewers will see a clearer interface, more online support, and more feedback. Section editors will have access to searchable lists of potential reviewers in each discipline, and the interface provides more information regarding the progress of articles through the review process.

During the period of transition we will be dealing with manuscripts in both systems. The confusion associated with this may at times result in duplicate requests or delays. There will be a learning curve as all involved become familiar with the new system and minor bugs are eliminated.

We appreciate your patience as we work through the transition and look forward to a more responsive Journal at the completion of the process.
